Ray Mantle lost his wife and all his memories of their time together in the Great Scream, and is trying to find. It isn't for. And finally matters proceed to a largely incomprehensible windup.

Granted, the backdrop is pretty cool, as some sort of psychic mutation is spread. If you are, his stories tend to be very rereadable. In the end the novel's themes do come around to those old standbys, redemption and forgiveness. The first and third sections are reasonably coherent, but the character-driven The Man Who Melted is dreadfully artless, stuff that should have been talked out in therapy. Too odd for me. The Journalist George Irving
